Introduction

THROUGH the courtesy of the French Government, and the co-operation of the French Ambassador and the Director of the Luxembourg Museum, the Detroit Museum of Art has the privilege of exhibiting a collection of paintings, sculpture, and medals owned by the Luxembourg Museum, during the month of March.

The works of art in this collection were purchased by the French Government for its national collections and are thoroughly representative of French art during the past forty years. They afford an opportunity such as has never been offered to the people of Detroit to study the masterpieces of a country whose art has been the foundation and inspiration of the modern art world.

The restive period from 1870 to 1910 in French art has seen many new tendencies struggling for supremacy. For this reason the group of pictures sent out by the French Government to exemplify the various manifestations will present a wide variety of subject and treatment. If individual canvases are studied, one may glean something of the evolution which French painting has undergone in the four decades, and, as varied as they may seem, may discern in each fundamental truths which justify the paternal protection of the Luxembourg Gallery.
